“Beyond the Time of Words is a suitcase of poems that instruct us in the art of losing things in a world held captive. Agosín’s words travel through the fear and longing of this present time and return to us the wonder and beauty in the small encounters that make up our everyday lives. If you need courage to breathe in this space between wakefulness and dreaming, you will find it here.” — Nisha Sajnani, editor, Drama Therapy Review, New York University

Composed during the time of isolation wrought by the COVID-19 pandemic, Marjorie Agosín’s bilingual book of poetry, Beyond the Time of Words/Más allá del tiempo de las palabras, embraces that darkness with profound compassion and humanity. While bearing witness to our collective grief, these poems also offer reminders of bravery and ultimately hope: They are meant, the poet says, “to cleanse and mend the world.”

Unalume González de León

“Reading the poems of Unalume González de León may be compared to sitting under the big tent holding your breath, your eyes riveted on a tightrope walker high above you. Take in her deft hand at composition, efficiency of language, word sounds—and all at once you are seeing through the poet’s eyes. This volume of laudable translations will surely bring new readers to a twentieth-century poet for the ages.” — Ana Castillo, author of My Book of the Dead and So Far from God

This second of three bilingual volumes presents several short collections of work that Mexican poet, essayist, and translator Unalume González de León produced from 1970 to 1975. Through her experimentation with unconventional syntax and borrowed texts, the poet skillfully blends anatomical, scientific, and philosophical vocabulary with richly erotic imagery to question our assumptions about identity and intimacy.

Silence Falls
Silence falls on the water’s edge.
It descends on the heavy swells.
The night looms on a world that rests from words
While the silence arrives as if it were holding strands of light.

This silence wishes to be heard in the vastness Of a voiceless world where We can only meet in the stillness.

And this silence, like a radiant sign,
Will teach us how to sing to the world.

— Marjorie Agosín

Syntax

not touching you is a silence in the discourse of touching you but is a word in the phrase of looking at you not looking at you is a silence in the discourse of looking at you

but is a word in the phrase of thinking of you not thinking of you is unthinkable like a phrase of silences interrupted by silences

— Unalume González de León
